ABSTRACT

Although historical-Jesus research in the last three decades has produced a great deal of divergent results, one is able to discern several important areas of progress. Perhaps the most important gain is in a renewed appreciation of the Judaic character of Jesus, his mission, and his world. New source material and more nuanced, contextual methodology have sharpened Jesus' profile as a Galilean Jew, standing in the tradition of Israel's redemption and restoration.

Key words: Cynics, Galilee, Jesus and archaeology, Jesus and Judaism, New Quest, Old Quest, Third Quest

These are exciting times for those who have learned interest in the Jesus of history. The publication of a significant number of Dead Sea Scrolls just over a decade ago, the publication in the last two decades or so of a host of related writings from or just before the New Testament period, and ongoing archaeological work in Israel, especially in and around Jerusalem and in Galilee, have called into question old conclusions and assumptions and opened the doors to new lines of investigation. It is not surprising that several academic and semi-academic books, published by leading presses, have enjoyed unprecedented sales and attention. Even major network television has produced documentaries and news programs, some of which were viewed by record-setting audiences.

The purpose of the present essay is to outline what I believe are key facets in the scholarly discussion of the historical Jesus. In my view there are five important areas of investigation and in all five there has been significant progress in recent years. I shall frame these areas as questions. They include (1) the question of the ethnic, religious, and social location of Jesus; (2) the question of the aims and mission of Jesus; (3) the question of Jesus' self-understanding; (4) the question of Jesus’ death; and (5) the question of Jesus’ resurrection. Some of these questions have important implications for Jewish-Christian relations.

* The present study is a revision of the plenary paper given at the AAR/SBL Rocky Mountains/Great Plains regional meeting in April 2005. I thank Professor Thomas A. Wayment, president of the region, for the invitation and generous hospitality. I also thank my AAR/SBL colleagues for their questions and comments.

The Question of Ethnic, Religious, and Social Location

Although it would be claiming too much to say that the fact and relevance of Jesus’ Jewish heritage were rarely taken into consideration by Christian scholars and theologians, it would not be too far off the mark. One of the great blemishes of much of twentieth-century scholarship allegedly concerned with the historical Jesus was the surprising lack of interest in the Jewish world in which he grew up and in which he conducted himself as an adult. Perhaps even worse, when the Jewish world of Jesus was taken into account, all too often it was presented in a distorted, jaundiced way.

It is not surprising that it has been Jewish scholars themselves who have tried to correct this neglect and distortion. Perhaps the most impressive effort came from Joseph Klausner (1874–1958), whose work appeared in Hebrew in 1922 and then in English translation in 1925. Although lacking some of the critical perspective widely accepted and expected today, Klausner’s book is a masterpiece, marked by learning and fairness. His survey of the primary sources and his review of the scholarship of the previous century are still of great value. Of particular usefulness is his critical survey of Jewish scholarship, from Joseph Salvador (1796–1873) to Claude Montefiore (1858–1938). Klausner calls our attention to Abraham Geiger’s ‘Judaism and its History in Twelve Lectures’, which devotes three lectures to Jesus and his disciples. Far from minimizing the Judaic character of Jesus and his teaching, Geiger (1810–74) goes so far as to describe Jesus as ‘a Jew, a Pharisaic Jew of Galilean type, one who looked forward to the hopes held at the time and who believed that those hopes would be fulfilled in himself. He propounded nothing whatever that was new, nor did he transcend the national limitations’. Geiger’s first sentence, with prescience and succinctness, adumbrates the findings of modern scholarship. His second sentence, however, is not only highly questionable, but stems from polemic and apologetic. Nevertheless, for all of its shortcomings, Geiger’s work rightly situates Jesus in his Jewish setting and recognizes the Judaic character of his teaching and activities.

Building on the work of Salvador, Geiger, Montefiore, and others, and moving beyond this early work with remarkable sophistication, Klausner himself concludes that ‘Jesus was convinced of his messiahship; of this there is no doubt; were it not so he would have been nothing more than a deceiver and imposter—and such men do not make history’. In my opinion, this sensible conclusion has been vindicated.

Klausner’s brilliant contribution unfortunately had little impact in Europe, which at that time was influenced by a new surge in historical skepticism, resulting largely from form criticism, and by varying degrees of anti-Semitism, which discouraged serious and positive investigation into the Judaic character and setting of Jesus. Indeed, the so-called New Quest of the historical Jesus, which erupted among the students of Rudolf Bultmann in the 1950s, was hardly an improvement in the situation. Bultmann and his pupils clung to the curious notion that what was authentic in the Jesus tradition could only be material that

---

5. Geiger, Das Judenthum und seine Geschichte in zwölf Vorlesung, p. 117, as quoted in English by Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth, p. 115.
6. Klausner (Jesus of Nazareth, p. 115 n. 49) notes further that Geiger, in Jüdische Zeitschrift 10 (1872), p. 156, asserts that ‘when all was said and done Jesus did nothing at all’. Klausner rightly rejects this judgment.
7. Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth, p. 342. A major shortcoming in Klausner’s work is in his assumption that Jesus grew up in bucolic isolation. At the time that Klausner wrote, archaeology and geographical surveys of Nazareth and Galilee were only in their beginning stages.
Journal for the Study of the Historical Jesus was dissimilar to first-century Judaism. Such a method—known as the criterion of dissimilarity—could hardly accommodate a portrait of Jesus that takes into account his Jewish context and the Jewish dimensions of his teaching and activities. Fortunately, this dubious criterion has received the trenchant criticism it deserves. Almost no one today is guided by it.

During the decades in which the German New Quest got under way, lost momentum, and finally foundered, Jewish scholars rediscovered Jesus. In 1954 Hans-Joachim Schoeps (1909–80) published his account of the life of Jesus. Schoeps had prepared for this work by undertaking several years of critical study, comparing aspects of Judaism and Christianity. In 1964 Asher Finkel (1935–) compared the teaching content and style of Jesus to those of his Jewish contemporaries, finding many parallels. In 1967 Schalom Ben-Chorin (1913–99) published his Bruder Jesus, a second edition of which appeared in 1978 and an English translation, Brother Jesus, in 2001. In 1968 David Flusser (1917–2000) published his Jesus in Selbstzeugnissen und Bilddokumenten, which subsequently appeared in revised editions and in English translation. All of these books attempt to show how fully Jewish Jesus was and in doing this they fly in the face of dominant forces in Christian—largely German—scholarship during this period. Although exerting relatively minor influence at the time of their publication, as it turns out, these works adumbrated things to come.

Perhaps the most influential Jewish scholar to turn his attention to the

8. Many scholars have criticized this criterion. For a recent criticism, see T. Holmén, ‘Doubts about Double Dissimilarity: Restructuring the Main Criterion of Jesus-of-History Research’, in B.D. Chilton and C.A. Evans (eds.), Authenticating the Words of Jesus (NTTS, 28.1; Leiden: Brill, 1999), pp. 47-80. See also the approach proposed in G. Theissen and D. Winter, Die Kriterienfrage in der Jesusforschung. Vom Differenzkriterium zum Plausibilitätskriterium (NTOA, 34; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997); ET: The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 2002). The subtitle in the German original underscores the shift away from the criterion of dissimilarity to a criterion that places emphasis on plausible context.

The historical Jesus has been Geza Vermes (1924–). Vermes’s trilogy of works, beginning in 1973 with Jesus the Jew, has influenced a generation of scholars and has placed Jesus in a Jewish setting once and for all. The full Jewish identity of Jesus is now recognized by Christian scholars as essential, as seen in the influential books by Ben Meyer (1979), Anthony Harvey (1982), E.P. Sanders (1985), and others. The Jewish contribution to the study of the historical Jesus has been formally analysed by Donald Hagner in his 1984 assessment The Jewish Reclamation of Jesus, a work which hopefully will someday be updated.

The fruitful progress of the rediscovery of the Judaic character and setting of Jesus is now everywhere seen. But before I can move to the next topic, a brief digression is required. In view of the almost overwhelming drive toward contextualizing Jesus in a Judaic context, the more recent work of John Dominic Crossan stands out starkly. As many know, Crossan has argued for seeing

17. At this point we encounter a bit of a conceptual quagmire. No doubt, Dom Crossan and Burton Mack, whose views I criticize, will counter that the Jesus of their respective reconstructions is Jewish also, even if this Jewishness is different from what I and others have posited. I recognize that there was no ‘pure’ Judaism—free of non-Jewish ideas—in existence in late antiquity. The ‘full Jewish identity’ of which I speak finds its definitions and points of view in those sources widely acknowledged as Jewish in origin and practice. These sources include the Jewish scriptures, the Dead Sea Scrolls, a host of apocryphal and pseudepigraphal writings, and—with proper critical assessment—early targumic and rabbinic tradition. All of this material is interpreted and applied in the light of the land of Israel itself and the archaeological evidence that has been uncovered. The emphasis, moreover, falls on literature that is not only Jewish, but Palestinian. This preference stands in contrast to the approach taken by Crossan, Mack, and others, who appeal to Greco-Roman sources, including Stoic literature and personalities, Greek rhetoricians, Cynics, and the like. Jewish literature is of course
Jesus as a Cynic—a Jewish Cynic to be sure—but a Cynic in the full sense of the term.\textsuperscript{18} The Cynic interpretation has been encouraged by Gerald Downing, who has assembled a great number of ostensible parallels between sayings of Jesus and sayings attributed to Cynics or philosophers and moralists who are thought to stand in the Cynic tradition.\textsuperscript{19} Impressed by these parallels, Dom Crossan, Burton Mack, and others have suggested that Jesus and his earliest following are best understood in terms of Cynic idiom. Accordingly, Jesus is viewed as iconoclastic and counter-cultural, not affirming Israel’s heritage and eschatological aspirations. For example, Mack remarks: ‘As remembered by the Jesus people, Jesus was much more like the Cynic-teacher than either a Christ-savior or a messiah with a program for the reformation of second-Temple Jewish society and religion’.\textsuperscript{20} Mack goes on to appeal to pre-Markan traditions and the Gospel of Thomas for support for a view that has struck most Gospel scholars and Jesus scholars as implausible.\textsuperscript{21}

Whereas Mack’s focus is primarily upon Q, the non-Markan source that most Gospels scholars think was utilized by Matthew and Luke, Dom Crossan seeks to get behind the sources, to lay bare the authentic historical Jesus. This Jesus, he finds, was an itinerant peasant Jewish Cynic. Crossan explains:

\begin{quote}
appealed to, but often it is Jewish literature with marked Hellenistic affinities that is given priority.
\end{quote}

The historical Jesus was, then, a peasant Jewish Cynic. His peasant village was close enough to a Greco-Roman city like Sepphoris that sight and knowledge of Cynicism are neither inexplicable nor unlikely. But his work was among the farms and villages of Lower Galilee. His strategy, implicitly for himself and explicitly for his followers, was the combination of free healing and common eating, a religious and economic egalitarianism that negated alike and at once the hierarchical and patronal normalcies of Jewish religion and Roman power. Miracle and parable, healing and eating were calculated to force individuals into unmediated physical and spiritual contact with God and unmediated physical and spiritual contact with one another. He announced, in other words, the brokerless kingdom of God.

Crossan’s historical Jesus has little interest in Scripture, either its teaching or its fulfillment. He seeks not the restoration of Israel, but the creation of com- mensality. In short, Jesus proclaims egalitarianism, not eschatology. In fairness to Crossan, whose conclusions have been vigorously challenged from many quarters, he is not advocating lifting Jesus out of his Jewish setting. Crossan is attempting to interpret Jesus and the Galilee of his times in the broader context of the Graeco-Roman world, where Hellenism flourished and in some places and in some times Cynicism attracted many followers. But the pressing question before us asks if there was in fact a Cynic presence in Galilee at this time, a presence that may have influenced Jesus and his followers? The evidence—both literary and archaeological—strongly suggests that there was not.

23. Not least N.T. Wright; see his Who Was Jesus? (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1992). In subsequent publications Crossan may have retreated somewhat from his claims. In his Jesus: A Revolutionary Biography (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1994) he concedes that in the final analysis we have ‘no way of knowing for sure what Jesus knew about Cynicism, or whether he knew about it at all’ (p. 122). Evidently, Crossan has heard his critics. But how much has he actually retreated from his Cynic interpretation? Not much, it seems. In the same paragraph just cited he goes on to suggest: ‘Maybe he...was just reinventing the Cynic wheel all by himself... Maybe Jesus is what peasant Jewish Cynicism looked like’ (p. 122, original emphasis). Crossan wants it both ways: a Cynic Jesus without relying on a highly doubtful Cynic presence in early first-century rural Galilee.

24. As Betz (‘Jesus and the Cynics’, p. 471) puts it: ‘The presumed presence of Cynics in the Galilean society in which Jesus lived is mostly fanciful conjecture. The evidence for Cynicism is limited to Gadara and Tyre, Hellenistic cities outside of Galilee...’. On the absence of a significant Jewish presence in Tyre, see Z. Ilan, ‘Galilee, Survey of Synagogues’, Excavations and Surveys in Israel 5 (1986–87), pp. 35-37. Summarizing the implications of archaeological studies in Galilee in recent years, Sean Freyne remarks: ‘The kind of cultural ambience that is required to support the Cynic hypothesis, at least in the rural areas, would appear to be missing. The conclusion does not of itself disprove the hypothesis, but simply points to the fact that the population of Galilee, Upper and Lower, in the first century CE contained a sufficient number of people whose cultural and religious roots were linked with the south, thereby identifying with Jerusalem and its Temple’. See S.V. Freyne, ‘Archaeology and the Historical Jesus’, in J.R. Bartlett (ed.), Archaeology and Biblical Interpretation (London and New York: Routledge, 1997), pp. 117-44, with quotation from p. 138.
One of the factors that encouraged Crossan and others to explore the Cynic hypothesis was the dramatic archaeological discoveries in Galilee in the 1970s and 80s. The discovery of numerous Greek inscriptions (and a few Latin inscriptions as well), along with a network of roads (for example, linking Caesarea on the Mediterranean and Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee) and major Graeco-Roman style buildings and city layouts, led scholars to reassess the old, quaint notion of Galilee as a cultural and commercial backwater. The significance of the proximity of Sepphoris to Nazareth was immediately appreciated by scholars. It has become apparent that Jesus did not grow up place-bound, in a rustic, unsophisticated environment.

But in the excitement of assessing the implications of a Galilee now seen in a new light, in some circles there was a lack of recognition of just how Jewish much of Galilee was in the pre-70 period. Graeco-Roman style urbanization and loyalty to the Torah were not mutually exclusive. The excavations of Sepphoris in the 1980s showed us how urban and wealthy the city of Sepphoris was, but the ongoing excavations of the 1990s and into the twenty-first century have also shown us how Jewish the inhabitants of this city were.

The discovery of a number of miqva’ot (ritual immersion pools) and stone water pots (which resist ritual impurity; cf. Jn 2.6) points unmistakably to the Jewish presence. The absence of pork bones, pagan cultic buildings, and coin imprints and other icons offensive to Jewish sensibilities argue not only for a Jewish presence, but the near absence of a non-Jewish population. In short, the evidence thus far uncovered suggests that the people of pre-70 Sepphoris were either Jewish or at least lived in a manner unobjectionable to Torah-observant Jews.

The upshot of these discoveries is that the intriguing hypothesis that Jesus was influenced by Cynic philosophers resident in Sepphoris is greatly weakened. It is not altogether ruled out, but its plausibility is seriously diminished. Moreover, recent excavations in Nazareth itself suggest that the assumption that Jesus and members of his family would in all probability (and perhaps of necessity) have worked in nearby Sepphoris is no longer so obvious. It appears that Nazareth

25. In his third Shaffer Lecture at Yale, E.P. Sanders (Jesus: His Religious “Type”, Reflections [1992], pp. 4-12) rightly calls into question the assumption of a Cynic presence at Sepphoris or anywhere else in Galilee, but errs in stating that Sepphoris was too far away for someone living in Nazareth to visit more than rarely. In fact, Sepphoris is only four miles from Nazareth; it takes less than two hours to walk the distance.

had its own thriving economy—including building, if the evidence of the stone quarries tells us anything. The commercial and economic activities of Nazareth were more than adequate to keep the local residents fully occupied, with little need to seek out-of-town employment.\(^7\)

If we are agreed that the ethnic, social, and religious location of Jesus is firmly a Jewish one (as defined by Jewish literature and tradition from Palestinian late antiquity), what then can we say about his teachings and activities? To these questions we now turn.

The Question of Aims and Mission

The studies of E.P. Sanders and the late Ben Meyer, long-time colleagues at McMaster University, are among the very best of the attempts to reconsider the aims and mission of Jesus.\(^8\) Both scholars rightly see the hope of Israel's restoration underlying Jesus' teaching and activities.

In my view the place to begin is with John the Baptist, who is presented in the New Testament as the 'forerunner' of Jesus the Messiah. Christian interpretation of the role of John is selective and apologetic, to be sure, but is very probably fair in its general placement of John in the restorative movements of the early first century and its linkage of John with Jesus.\(^9\) Linkage with Jesus is almost a critical certainty, given the improbability of having Jesus baptized by John ‘for the forgiveness of sins’ (cf. Mk 1.4), if in fact he had not. According to Christian theology, Jesus is sinless, so why invent a story of having him baptized by John, who baptized repentant Israelites? Placing John in the context of restoration movements of this time is also probable. This makes the most sense of John’s location at the Jordan River. Now, it is true that Josephus emphasizes the political reasons that Herod Antipas had for disposing of John (Ant. 18.5.2 §116-19), but there is no justification for viewing the various accounts of Josephus and the New Testament Gospels as irreconcilable. For obvious reasons, Josephus wishes to avoid the topic of messianism and Jewish national restoration. (After all, he is trying to preserve the favour he enjoys in Flavian Rome and at the same time write in defence of the Jewish people.) John’s political embarrassment for Herod is all he wishes to relate. In contrast, the New Testament evangelists, who also relate John’s imprisonment and death at the hand of Herod, emphasize John’s eschatology. John called on Israel to repent and prepare for the coming day of the Lord. John’s message and his sudden removal from the public scene created the perfect entry for Jesus.

But the linkage between John and Jesus is far more significant than this. John’s oblique reference to ‘these stones’, in the context of the Jordan River (cf. Mt. 3.9 = Lk. 3.8), almost certainly alludes to the twelve stones erected by Joshua on the occasion of Israel’s crossing into the Promised Land (cf. Josh. 4; Deut. 27.4). As the ‘false’ prophet Theudas twenty years later, who called the poor to join him at the Jordan, whose waters at his command would be parted (Josephus, Ant. 20.5.1 §97-98; cf. Acts 5.36), so John summons the poor of spirit to join him for baptism at the Jordan and be baptized. Jesus answers this call and shortly later appoints twelve disciples (cf. Mk 3.14), the significance of which almost certainly points to the restoration of Israel. This appointment of twelve disciples is in all probability an extension of John’s Jordan symbolism.30

If I am correct here, then we have at hand an important clue in understanding the aims and mission of Jesus. His announcement of the presence of the kingdom (or rule) of God is an announcement of the restoration of Israel. The call to repent is intended not only to facilitate the fullness of God’s rule, but also constitutes a warning of coming judgment. God will soon rule the earth, as he rules heaven, but his earthly rule will not co-exist with sin and disobedience. Israel must repent and following this repentance will be the long-awaited eschatological blessings.

The healings and exorcisms of Jesus must also be seen in this light. Defending himself, Jesus argues, ‘if it is by the finger of God that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you’ (Lk. 11.20). The healings, especially the exorcisms, offer tangible evidence of the truth of Jesus’ proclamination: The rule of God on earth really has begun. This is why when Jesus sends the twelve out to preach the rule of God, he authorizes them to heal and exorcise also (Mk 3.14-15; 6.7; Mt. 10.1; Lk. 9.1-2). 31

Now we turn to what implications this proclamation and these activities have for assessing Jesus’ self-understanding. If we understand rightly what Jesus was actually saying and what he was trying to achieve, we shall probably understand him better.

The Question of Jesus’ Self-Understanding

Jesus’ best-known self-reference is the almost ubiquitous sobriquet ‘son of man’. It appears abruptly in the Markan Gospel, without explicit definition and almost devoid of context. In the Gospels this sobriquet is linked to Daniel’s vision of the coming son of man, who from God receives authority and kingdom (Dan. 7.13-14). There are two important indications that this self-reference does indeed derive from Daniel 7. First and obvious, on a few occasions the sobriquet ‘son of man’ is linked with words and phrases from Daniel 7. We hear of the son of man coming with the clouds of heaven (Mk 14.62), which alludes to Dan. 7.13, and we hear of the son of man coming not to be served, but to serve (Mk 10.45), which alludes to Dan. 7.14. 32 Secondly, and less obviously, Jesus says that as son of man he has authority on earth to forgive sins (Mk 2.10). At first reading, the qualifying phrase ‘on earth’ seems otiose. Where else does the historical Jesus have authority? Where else does his ministry take place? The phrase ‘on earth’, linked with the sobriquet ‘son of man’, immediately takes the hearer back to Daniel 7, where the son of man, in heaven, receives from God authority. Having received authority in heaven, the son of man now exercises authority on earth.

From these passages and from others, it seems apparent that the son of man self-designation is not simply Aramaic idiom, a way of saying a ‘human’, as opposed to an animal or an angel. Now it is true that the ‘son of man’ is an

32. The allusion here is in some sense subversive. However, it is not correct to say simply that Jesus has contradicted Dan. 7.14; rather, he has qualified it, in the light of the struggle described in Dan. 7.15-27 and in light of the suffering servant of Isa. 52.13-53.12.
Aramaic idiom (bar enosh) that is a way of referring to a human. But Jesus' habit of referring to the sobriquet with the definite article—the son of man—is meant to call to mind a particular son of man figure. The definite article does not suggest in itself a title, nor does it in itself suggest that the idiom is messianic. Jesus says 'the son of man' (Greek: υἱὸς τοῦ άνθρώπου, lit. 'the son of the man'), in order to allude to a specific figure, in a specific passage of Scripture: that is, the son of man figure described in Daniel 7, the figure who is presented to God and from God receives kingdom and authority. Jesus has received this authority—and perhaps his vision at the time of his baptism is when he experienced this (Mk 1.10-11)—and now preaches the rule of God and demonstrates its powerful presence by casting out Satan.

The authenticity of the self-reference 'son of man' can hardly be doubted. This is widely held because of the observation that the early church did not in fact exploit this Aramaic idiom in its formulation of Christology. The idiom simply made no sense in Greek or Latin. Early Christians, accordingly, preferred sobriquets such as 'son of God' or 'saviour' or 'Messiah', not 'son of man'. Thus we observe the curious phenomenon of the early church suppressing what was in reality Jesus' favorite designation, a designation that worked well in Aramaic-speaking, Scripture-hearing Galilee, but worked poorly elsewhere.

As the 'son of man', invested by God with authority on earth to proclaim God's rule, to forgive sin, and to make pronouncements relating to what can be done on the Sabbath and what is clean, and the like, Jesus naturally thought of himself as a prophet, speaking forth the word of God. Again, the strongest evidence for this is seen in a passage that cannot be easily explained as a Christian invention: 'A prophet is not without honor, except in his own country, and among his own kin, and in his own house' (Mk 6.4). Because the saying is set in a context of rejection and ineffective ministry, it is almost certainly not the product of Christian apologetic or piety, but derives from Jesus himself. Evidently the public too thought of Jesus as a prophet (cf Mk 8.27-28). We might note also that when Jesus is arrested and mocked, he is asked to prophesy (cf Mk 14.65), thus in all probability alluding to his reputation as a prophet. In context, this

33. This is essentially the view of C.F.D. Moule, The Origin of Christology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977), pp. 11-22. See also B.D. Chilton, 'The Son of (the) Man, and Jesus', in Chilton and Evans (eds.), Authenticating the Words of Jesus, pp. 259-87, esp. pp. 273-80. I am aware that there is a body of very respectable work that argues for the senses of either circumlocution ('I' or 'me') or generic ('a man'). This is not the place to develop criticisms against these options, or advance detailed arguments in favour of the view taken in this essay. The only argument I offer here is that taking the epithet 'the son of man' as a specific reference to the figure described in Daniel 7 satisfactorily explains the ubiquitous presence of the definite article, as well as the occasional linkage of the epithet with other details in the text of Daniel 7. insult does not advance or reflect Christian beliefs about Jesus. After all, Jesus is the Messiah and Son of God, not a mere prophet.

This brings us to the question of Jesus’ messianic identity. It was not long ago that critical scholarship argued or assumed that early Christianity’s confession of Jesus as Israel’s Messiah was an understandable consequence of the excitement of the resurrection. If resurrected, then what else could Jesus be? Prophet and teacher no longer seemed adequate. Surely Jesus is the Messiah—so goes the argument. But this reasoning has fallen on hard times. After all, it is not so much the messianic identity of Jesus, per se, that Christians proclaimed; it was his divine status, his role as mediator between heaven and earth that was proclaimed throughout the Roman Empire. Greeks and Romans were not interested in a Jewish Messiah. But a divine Saviour was a different matter.

The ubiquity of the title Messiah, or, in Greek idiom, Christ, is not easily explained as an Easter afterthought. It is far better to think that the universally held opinion following the resurrection that Jesus was the Messiah was due to what Jesus himself taught and encouraged his disciples to believe. There is, of course, specific evidence for this, as seen especially in Jesus’ appeal to Isa. 61.1-2 (‘the Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed to preach...’), explicitly in his Nazareth sermon (Lk. 4.16-30) and implicitly in his reply to the imprisoned and discouraged John the Baptist (Mt. 11.2-5 = Lk. 7.18-22). The messianic import of these allusions to words and phrases from Isaiah 61 and other Isaianic passages has now been dramatically clarified and confirmed by a fragmentary text found among the Dead Sea Scrolls, According to 4Q521, when God’s Messiah appears, the sick will be healed, the dead will be raised, and the poor will have good news preached to them. According to 11QMelchizedek,

34. The criterion of embarrassment strongly supports the authenticity of the story of the reply to the imprisoned John: (1) It is unlikely the early Christian movement would create a story in which such an important figure as John questions the fundamental identity of Jesus: ‘Are you the Coming One, or should we look for another?’ (2) One would expect a piece of confessional material to have Jesus affirm his status in a more direct manner (e.g., ‘Go and tell John that I am he’), instead of replying, ‘Go and tell John what you are hearing and seeing...’ For discussion, see D.C. Allison Jr. and W.D. Davies, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel according to Saint Matthew. II: Commentary on Matthew VIII-XVIII (ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1991), pp. 244-46; J.P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus. III. Companions and Competitors (ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 2001), pp. 496-98.

the herald of Isaiah 61 was expected to proclaim the eschatological jubilee, which also appears to cohere with Jesus’ surprising declarations that sinners (or debtors) are forgiven (e.g., Mk 2.5-10; Lk. 7.47-49).

And finally, we must ask if Jesus anticipated his death, and if he did, what significance did he attach to his death. In my opinion it is almost a certainty that Jesus anticipated his death, at least at some point in his ministry, either shortly before entering Jerusalem (as in the Synoptic Gospels), or perhaps shortly after entering Jerusalem that final Passover week. I conclude this, not simply because the death of John the Baptist would have pressed itself on Jesus’ thinking (cf. Mk 9.9-13), or because Jesus was a realist and had to have known that the ruling priests were set on destroying him. The clearest evidence that Jesus anticipated his death is seen in his prayers in Gethsemane (Mk 14.32-40). The portrait of the frightened, grieving Jesus is hardly the stuff of pious imagination. One should compare the Johannine portrait of the composed, serene Jesus, who calmly discusses the glory that he and his heavenly Father share (John 17). The Synoptic portrait of the frightened Jesus who falls on his face and begs God to remove from him the cup of suffering (Mk 14.36) is surely historical.36

If Jesus did indeed anticipate suffering and death, then I find it very likely that he sought to find meaning in it. After all, the deaths of the righteous, especially in the time of the Antiochid persecution and the Maccabaean revolt, were understood to be of benefit to the nation of Israel.37 Why should Jesus think any

36. The objection that the disciples were not close enough to Jesus to hear his prayers is a naive form of skepticism. Jews of late antiquity prayed aloud. In the case of the Gethsemane prayer, Jesus in all probability prayed loudly and with great emotion. Hearing and remembering one or two brief lines of his prayer are what we should expect.

37. A brief comment is needed with regard to the books by S.K. Williams, Jesus’ Death as Saving Event: The Background and Origin of a Concept (HDR, 2; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1975); and D. Seeley, The Noble Death: Graeco–Roman Martyrology and Paul’s Concept of Salvation (JSNTSup, 28; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1990). Williams rightly calls attention to the importance of 4 Maccabees for understanding—in a Jewish-Hellenistic setting—the atoning value of the death of a righteous person. Building on this work, Seeley applies it to Pauline soteriology, in which Jesus’ death is portrayed as a ‘noble death’ modelled after ideas of the martyrdom of the philosopher. I have no particular objection to much of this work. But the claim that behind the words attributed to Jesus (e.g., at Mk 10.45; 14.22-25) and the soteriology of Paul is no Palestinian Jewish idea of the atoning benefit of the death of the righteous is highly questionable. Pace Williams (Jesus’ Death, pp. 213-17) Mk 10.45 is almost certainly an allusion to Isaiah 53 (specifically 52.13 and 53.11). On this point, see M. Hengel, The Atonement: The Origins of the Doctrine in the New Testament (London: SCM Press; Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1981), pp. 33-75; P. Stuhlmacher, ‘Vicariously Giving His Life for Many, Mark 10:45 (Matt. 20:28)’, in idem, Reconciliation, Law, and Righteousness (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1986), pp. 16-29. Also problematic is the assumption that the views of the admittedly Hellenistic (but quite Jewish) 4 Maccabees (esp. 1.11; 6.28-29) have no parallels in materials that clearly originated in Palestine and were in circulation in the time of Jesus. Palestinian texts that presuppose ideas of the atoning benefit of the suffering and death of the less of his own death? I think it most probable that Jesus pondered the meaning of his death and sought to explain it to his frightened, discouraged disciples. Jesus saw in his death, in the shedding of his own blood, a Passover-like sacrifice that would benefit Israel. At the same time Jesus remained confident that God would raise him up and that someday he would drink the Passover cup in the kingdom of God (Mk 14.25).

The very words of institution, ‘This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many’ (Mk 14.25), appear to be a conflation of Old Testament texts that speak of the blood of sacrifice, covenant, and renewal (Exod. 24.8; Jer. 31.31; Zech. 9.11). The tradition is ancient (1 Cor. 11.23-25) and thoroughly Jewish (cf. 1 Cor. 5.7 ‘Christ, our paschal lamb, has been sacrificed’). To the very end Jesus remains as Jewish as ever. Even the meaning of his death is seen in very Jewish terms.

The Question of Jesus’ Death

Mel Gibson’s recent movie, The Passion of the Christ, stirred up emotions, especially in Jewish circles. The fear that anti-Semitic feelings would be aroused is understandable, especially in light of a long and unfortunate association of Passion plays and anti-Semitism reaching back to the Middle Ages. Not surprisingly, the popular press, spiked with scholarly and semi-scholarly input, raised the old question of who was responsible for the death of Jesus. This question may seem complicated and difficult to the laity, but it really is not.

righteous include 1 Macc. 6.44; 2 Macc. 7.37-38 (pace Seeley, Noble Death, pp. 87-91); 11QtgJob 38.2-3 (‘God hearkened to Job’s voice and forgave them their sins on account of him’); 1QS 8.3-4 (‘they shall atone for sin by doing justice and by suffering the sorrows of affliction’); Prayer of Azariah (RSV 3.38-40); LAB 18.5 (‘And because he did not refuse, his sacrifice was well pleasing to me, and on account of his blood I chose them’); T. Mos. 9.6-10.1; and perhaps T. Benj. 3.8 and Life of Adam and Eve 3.1. Neither Williams nor Seeley takes into account 11QtgJob, which is clearly pre-Christian, Palestinian, and available in Aramaic, the language of Jesus and his following. They also ignore some of the other texts.

38. It is very probable Jesus believed in his resurrection (cf. Mk 12.18-27), as did many Jews of his day (cf. 1 Enoch 22-27; 92-205; Jub. 23.11-31; 4 Ezra 7.26-42; Josephus, War 2.8.11 §154; 2.8.14 §165-66), though probably in terms of the general not individual resurrection (as in Isa. 26.19; Dan. 12.2; Hos. 6.2). The language of ‘after three days’ or ‘on the third day’ derives from Hos. 6.2 (‘He will revive us after two days, on the third day he will raise us up that we may live before him’), which in the Aramaic is understood in reference to the day of resurrection (‘...on the day of the resurrection of the dead he will raise us up’).

39. For a scholarly assessment of Gibson’s film, as well as aspects of Jesus’ death and the personalities and factors involved, see K. Corley and R.L. Webb (eds.), Jesus and Mel Gibson’s The Passion of the Christ (London and New York: T&T Clark International, 2004); S. Brent Collaboration between local authorities and their Roman overlords was standard administrative procedure in the Roman Empire. In Judea in the time of Jesus’ ministry, this meant the collaboration between high priest Caiaphas and his priestly colleagues, on the one hand, and Pontius Pilate and his retainers, on the other. The evidence indicates that the Jewish high priest and the Roman governor were able to work together. Caiaphas was appointed to office about one year before Pilate took office and the latter allowed the former to remain as high priest for the duration of his administration (in contrast to Gratus his predecessor, who apparently appointed a new high priest almost annually). Indeed, the nearly simultaneous removal, from office, of the high priest and the governor in early 37 suggests that they were implicated together in the violent Samaritan affair, an affair into which Caiaphas may well have dragged Pilate (Josephus, Ant. 18.4.2-3 §88-95). In any event, the evidence that we have—and it is rich thanks to the New Testament evangelists and Josephus, all of whom wrote within one generation of Pilate’s administration—documents very helpfully how Jewish and Roman authorities shared the responsibilities of government.

Indeed, the accounts of the destruction of various renewal movements—such as those led by Theudas and later by the anonymous Jew from Egypt—strongly suggest that Roman officials acted upon intelligence, along with biblical explanations, supplied to them by their Jewish associates. The case of the arrest, examination, and release of Jesus, son of Ananias, in 62 is another important case in point. Like Jesus of Nazareth (Mk 11,17), Jesus, son of Ananias, appealed to Jeremiah 7 in his prophecies of woe upon Jerusalem and the Temple. Ruling priests threatened and intimidated this man and eventually had him arrested and handed over to the Roman governor, with demands that he be put to death (cf. Josephus, War 6.5.3 §300-309). The governor questioned and scourged the hapless prophet of doom, but released him—over the protests of the Jewish authorities—as a harmless lunatic. The parallels between the experiences of these two Jesuses are quite significant, with the latter Jesus providing important corroboration of the Gospel story of the earlier Jesus.

Just as Jesus, son of Ananias, had two ‘trials’—one before the Jewish authorities and a second before the Roman governor—so too did Jesus of Nazareth undergo two trials. Of course, it might be too much to call his examination by the Jewish authorities a trial—perhaps ‘hearing’ would be better. In any case, the high priest called part of the council together and secured a consensus from them. Jesus’ threats against the Temple establishment, complete with offensive allusions to Jeremiah 7 (cf. Mk 11.15-18), and his bold claim to be the figure described in Daniel 7, who some day will sit in judgment on his judges, moved the council to condemn him.

40. On Theudas, see Josephus, Ant. 20.5.1 §97-98; Acts 5.36; on the man from Egypt, see Josephus, Ant. 20.8.6 §169-70; Acts 21.38.

The final decision lay with the Roman governor. Pilate’s hesitation to accede immediately to the ruling priests’ call for execution, a hesitation that the evangelists understandably exploit to the fullest, had everything to do with political caution, not with a commitment to justice. Pilate knew full well the dangers of rabble-rousers and no doubt appreciated the gravity of the charges brought against Jesus. But he also recognized the dangers of provoking the Jewish people at Passover time by publicly executing a popular teacher.

Some have argued that Pilate was violent, even bloodthirsty, and that the Gospels’ portrait of a hesitating governor is apologetic fiction. I disagree. Pilate served as governor as long as he did because he did not act rashly and was not in fact prone to violence. The portrait of a violent Pilate comes from an uncritical reading of Josephus and, especially, of Philo. Both of these Jewish writers, themselves apologists, found it expedient to vilify Pilate, greatly exaggerating his faults. Even so, his clashes with his subjects were few. In fact, only in two instances was there bloodshed (or three, if Lk. 13.1-3 is a separate incident). If he took office in 19 or 20, instead of 25 or 26, as has been traditionally held, then his tenure ran some 17 or 18 years, making him the longest-serving governor of Judea. By Roman standards, only two violent clashes (the last one involving the Samaritans and resulting in Pilate’s recall) in that much time hardly constitute a bloody record.

Even the so-called Passover pardon is probably historical and not a piece of reckless, easily disproved fiction. What I find interesting is that Pilate’s practice of extending a pardon at Passover very likely was sourced in Jewish tradition and was meant to show respect for Israel’s greatest holiday. When confronted with the dilemma of Jesus of Nazareth, the wily governor used his practice of clemency to shield himself from political fallout, if there be any, in the aftermath of Jesus’ execution. After all, how can the Jewish people blame him, when he had in fact offered to release the popular preacher? Far from fiction, the

42. See H.K. Bond, Pontius Pilate in History and Interpretation (SNTSMS, 100; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998).
43. As is argued by D.R. Schwartz, ‘Pontius Pilate’, ABD, V, pp. 395-401.
45. In that Passover signified release from captivity. Although there is not a hint of this idea in the Gospels, it provides a very plausible backdrop to Pilate’s act of clemency on the occasion of Passover. It is interesting that the Synoptic Gospels (in contrast to the fourth Gospel) make so little of the Passover context.
Gospels’ accounts of Jesus’ appearances before Jewish and Roman authorities give every indication of being accurate and well informed.46

Not only was the offer of a Passover pardon a concession to Jewish tradition and sensitivities, so was the governor’s willingness to allow the bodies of the crucified men to be taken down, before sunset, and be buried properly, according to Jewish custom. There is no evidence—archaeological or literary—that bodies of the executed were left unburied in Israel, especially in and around Jerusalem, during peacetime. The skeleton of the crucified man, found near Jerusalem, whose right heel was transfixed by an iron spike, dated to the time of Pilate’s administration, offers grim supporting evidence for the view that the governor did indeed allow the crucified to be properly buried and not left on the cross to rot or cast into a ditch, exposed to animals. I will say more about this shortly.

Furthermore, the Gospels’ accounts of a member of the Jewish council seeing to burial arrangements is also in keeping with Jewish traditions, whereby certain tombs were set aside for this very purpose. To be sure, we see apologetical touches in the story, as Joseph of Arimathea, in the telling of the story, becomes increasingly supportive of Jesus and his mission. Nevertheless, the specificity of details and the coherence with Jewish customs argue for authenticity.47 Moreover, the story as told in the Gospels is not easily explained as fiction. Surely a fictional account would give prominence to some of Jesus’ disciples, such as Peter. But the disciples of Jesus have fled; his body is left in the hands of the very authorities that condemned him. The only friendly witnesses of the burial are women.

The Question of the Resurrection

Jewish burial traditions can potentially tell us much about the world of Jesus, and perhaps even clarify at one or two points his teaching and, even more significantly, clarify aspects of his death and burial. The discovery and analysis of hundreds of skeletons and skeletal remains have told us much about the health and longevity of the people. It gives us pause to discover that in a typical two or three-generation burial crypt more than one half of the skeletons are of children. Indeed, in some cases two-thirds of the remains are of children. From data such as these, some historical anthropologists have speculated that as many as one-quarter of the population in Jesus’ time was ill, injured, and in need of medical attention on any given day. This grim possibility gives new meaning to the Gospels’ notice that crowds were attracted to Jesus, because he was known as a healer (e.g., Mk 3.10; 4.1; 5.27-28).

The Jewish practice of ossilegium, that is, the reburial of the bones of the deceased, may explain Jesus’ enigmatic remark to the would-be follower who requested that he first be allowed to ‘bury his father’. Jesus replies: ‘Let the dead bury their own dead’ (Mt 8.22 = Lk. 9.60). It has been plausibly suggested that the man has requested delaying discipleship until he has reburied his father’s bones. Jesus has not urged the man to ignore his dying father. Rather, Jesus urges him to allow the dead (i.e., the dead relatives in the family crypt) to see to the final burial of the man’s dead father (whose skeletal remains await gathering). Proclaiming the rule of God to the living takes precedence.

Jewish burial practices, including Jewish sensitivities regarding corpse impurity and the sacred duty to bury the dead, argue strongly against the novel theory proposed a decade ago that Jesus’ corpse may well have been unburied, either left hanging on the cross or perhaps was thrown in a ditch, exposed to animals as carrion. It has been pointed out that hundreds, if not thousands, of Jews who were crucified during wartime or insurrection were left unburied. This is true, but Jesus was crucified during peacetime. It is inconceivable that the bodies of Jesus and the other men would have been left unburied just outside the walls of Jerusalem, during Passover season. I repeat: the grim discovery in an ossuary of the remains of the crucified man, mentioned above, is graphic evidence that Pontius Pilate permitted the crucified to be buried and sometime later the bones to be gathered and placed in an ossuary in the family crypt—all according to Jewish burial customs.

Jewish burial practice may also shed light on the reasons why the women returned to Jesus’ tomb early Sunday morning. Evidently their motivation was to perfume Jesus’ body, so that the seven days of mourning could take place. Making note of which tomb contained Jesus’ body (for he was in a tomb reserved for criminals—not in his family’s tomb), they hoped eventually to gather the bones of Jesus and take them to his family tomb. Accordingly, the women took special interest in the burial place. Finding the body removed would, therefore, have occasioned great consternation.

49. B.R. McCane, “‘Let the Dead Bury Their Own Dead’: Secondary Burial and Matt 8:21-22”, HTR 83 (1990), pp. 31-43.
The story told in the New Testament Gospels—in contrast to the greatly embellished versions found in the Gospel of Peter and other writings—smacks of verisimilitude. The women went to the tomb to mourn privately and to perform duties fully in step with Jewish burial customs. They expected to find the body of Jesus; ideas of resurrection played no role in their behaviour. The careful attention given the temporary tomb is exactly what we should expect. Pious fiction—like that seen in the Gospel of Peter—emphasized other things. Archaeology can neither prove nor disprove the resurrection, but it can and has shed important light on the circumstances surrounding Jesus' death, burial, and apparently missing corpse.

Concluding Comments

Research into the historical Jesus has taken several positive steps in recent years. Archaeology, remarkable literary discoveries, such as the Dead Sea Scrolls, and progress in reassessing the social, economic, and political setting of first-century Palestine have been major factors. Notwithstanding the eccentricities and skepticism of the Jesus Seminar, which in my opinion is not really part of today's Third Quest, but an atavism harking back to the older New Quest (and perhaps even to the Old Quest itself), the persistent trend in recent years is to see the Gospels as essentially reliable, especially when properly understood, and to view the historical Jesus in terms much closer to Christianity's traditional understanding, that is, as the proclaimer of God's rule, as understanding himself as the Lord's anointed, and, indeed, as God's own son, destined to rule Israel. But this does not mean that the historical Jesus that has begun to emerge in recent years is simply a throwback to the traditional portrait. The picture of Jesus that has emerged is more finely nuanced, more obviously Jewish, and in some ways more unpredictable than ever.

The last word on the subject has not been written and probably never will be. Ongoing discovery and further investigation will likely force us to make further revisions as we read and read again the old Gospel stories and try to come to grips with the life of this remarkable Galilean Jew.

52. The skepticism expressed in many of the publications emanating from the Jesus Seminar often rests on a failure to understand the dominal tradition correctly in the first place.